COLUMBUS MULTIFAMILY

COVID-19 Constrains Central Ohio's Headway

Despite the ongoing economic and financial volatility generated by the COVID-19 crisis, Columbus remains one of the best-performing housing markets in the Midwest. Backed by steady demographic trends and faced with the implementation of a stay-at-home order, rental demand across the metro endured. On a trailing three-month basis through May, Columbus rents were up 0.4%, while the average national rate contracted by 0.2%.

Employment growth started to slowly decelerate at the beginning of last year. After the pandemic began to take a toll on Columbus' economy, the unemployment rate quickly escalated from 4.2% in March to 13.7% in April. Leisure and hospitality was the first sector to take a hit, but others followed suit. The state distributed more than $3.8 billion in unemployment claims produced by the coronavirus outbreak, which has put a lot of pressure on relief funding. State officials requested $3.1 billion from the federal government to continue meeting unemployment obligations.

In the first five months of this year, developers delivered 1,088 units, all catering to high-income residents, with an additional 7,387 apartments underway as of May. The current pipeline was slated to account for a new development cycle peak in 2020. However, with the effects of the health crisis still unfolding, on-going projects could face significant delays.
